Microfluidic chip for the analysis of live macrophages. Microfluidic devices that are used for biological analysis are commonly based on the use of glass or silica surfaces. These surfaces, however, can be cytotoxic, and therefore, alternative methods are needed for the surface modification and functionalization of microfluidic devices. Here, we present a chip-based method for the functionalization of surfaces with bioactive ligands. We functionalized a glass substrate with a layer of poly-L-lysine, and used it to immobilize poly-L-lysine-derivatized dextran, via the covalent bonding between the amine and the carboxylate groups. We successfully showed that the modified surface can capture and stabilize a bio-active polymer, dextran. As a proof of concept, we used this device to analyze the phagocytosis of live macrophages by other macrophages. And finally, our great live Final Fantasy XIV event has come to an end, and we're ready to deliver a conclusion to the story. If you haven't played the demo of Final Fantasy XIV's upcoming sequel, A Realm Reborn, it's time to pull yourself out of that hole you've been living in for a year. With that said, we'd like to thank you again for being a part of this journey, and we hope you have a great holiday season. Looking forward, we'll be looking forward to getting our hands on A Realm Reborn to find out what happens next. I'm a huge RPG fan and have been involved in the industry since a very young age. When I'm not writing for Gamebreaker, I'll be freelancing with comic book companies, reviewing games, or writing my own stories. Feel free to hit me up if you want to discuss anything!

Q: Explanation of function declaration in objective-c I'm a beginner in objective-c. Can someone explain this statement to me? @property (nonatomic, assign, readwrite) UIImage *cachedImage; 82157476af
